Before either political liberalism or nationalism could become institutionalised in European nations, the Continent passed through a period of “Conservative Reaction”. Since, Europe had to suffer through decades long of wars and chaos, as well as the reign of terror in France due to reasons and revolutions inspired by “liberalism and nationalism”, thus the many in Europe tended to regard that the abstract ideas of liberalism, equality and even nationalism leading inevitably to anarchy. In the interests of an orderly government, the rights of property, and the existence of the European civilisation, many Europeans, therefore, set their faces resolutely against every doctrine which carried the liberal taint for a long period. Through “the Congress of Vienna” in 1815, a newer system for co-operation among nations, called “the Concert of Europe”, was established to prevent any future war and also to maintain stability in Europe. Despite the efforts, Europe experienced a number of revolutions, particularly “the Revolutions of 1848”, leading to the institutionalisation in Europe, of both the political liberalism and nationalism. “The Era of Metternich”, as this conservative phase is called.
